Try Again. Cancel. Thirteen year old Andrea is battling to be able to visit her grandfather in hospital. Today, she has had to leave school and has gone to her grandparents in the hope that they can visit him. There is a lot more to Andrea than meets the eye. Outwardly, she is loving and caring, but beneath the surface, she is full of doubt and anxiety. Despite coming from a family where all her grandparents were “happy and healthy”, Andrea can’t help but worry about how they are coping in her grandpa’s old age. When she finds a letter from her grandpa’s doctor that suggests he might have dementia, she has to face up to the reality that he may have only a short time left. This is the story of Andrea and her parents, who are struggling with this sudden diagnosis, and their journey as they come to terms with the fact that the condition will not be cured and they will need to look after their grandfather for the rest of their lives. The documentary follows Andrea, her parents, their siblings, her grandmother, and the people and events that make up the day-to-day life of the family in the moments before, during and after the diagnosis of dementia. Andrea’s sister is trying to be brave, her parents are trying to support each other and cope with the diagnosis, and Andrea herself is trying to find a balance between coping with her worries and dealing with her anxiety. The family starts to deal with the situation as it evolves, as Andrea faces up to the prospect that her grandfather may not be able to live for very long. They attempt to find a balance between their priorities as a family and the impact this situation has on everyone’s life. The documentary was filmed in Macedonia, Croatia and Slovenia and was nominated for the Best Documentary Award at the 2014 European TV Award. It was also nominated for the European Diversity Award and won the Best Drama Category at the 2014 Clio Festival in Hollywood. An incredibly heartwarming true story. 1/9/2016 – 1 star. 1/9/2016 This documentary follows 13 year old Andrea as she tries to face the reality that her grandfather is suffering from dementia.
